Submarine and Blockade Case May be Submitted to Wilson for Settlement

NOTE WILL NOT BE READY FOR FORTNIGHT

Kaiser Returning to Berlin To Begin Work of Framing Reply to President's Note Belief Growing that Strain Will be Relieved

(BY UNITED PRESS)

Berlin, June 15.—It is now certain that Germany's reply to the second American note will not go forward for at least a fortnight, and inquiries at the foreign office indicate that it may be even longer before the note is completed and transmitted.

Emperor William is expected to return to Berlin from his headquarters at the front within a few days. Upon his return work will begin on the first draft of the documens which is so eagery awaited in American.

It is believed here that some expression has been had from London on that part of the note reating to mediation by the United States in the German-British shipping question and the general proposition of the freedomof the seos, and in some quarters the impression is gained that Germany will be entirely willing to submit the matter to mediation.

The German press continues to comment favorably on the pacific tone of the Amreican note, and that Germany's reply will not add further strain to the diplomatic situation is now generally accepted.

BLOCKADE ORDER TO BE CONTINUED, SAYS LONDON

Great Britain Unwilling to Modify it Even if Germany Agrees to Quit Submarine Policy

(BY UNITED PRESS)

London, June 15.—Little hope is held out here that England will be willing to modify her blockade order even if Germany agrees to discontinue her submarine program. Officials who reflect the sentiment of the government declare that the blockade is justified, and that its enforcement not only is not causing starvation in Germany of non-combatants, but is in every way in accord wtih the usages and customs of civilized warfare.

BRIL COMPANY TO MAKE SHELLS FOR RUSSIAN ARMY

Million Dollar Order Placed With Car Building Firm by Russian Government

(BY UNITED PRESS)

Philadelphia, June 15.—A million dollar contract for steel shells for Russian is said to be chiefly responsible for a trade boom which is sweeping over the J. G. Bril company, car and truck manufacturers. Canadian representatives of the Russian government are said to be supervising the making of the shells in the big plant. Members of the firm yesterday declined to deny the activities accredited to their concern.

GOVERNOR'S COURSE WINS BACKING OF PROGRESSIVES

Pottsville, Pa., June 15.—That the "back-to-the-party" movement is not without foundation in Schuylkill county is indicated by remarks made this week by William Wilhelm, one of the most active Washington party men in the state. Among other things, Mr. Wilhelm said:

"There is no gainsaying the fact Governor Brumbaugh's vetoes are winning his way into the hearts of the Progressives of the state. That is very generally conceded by all the active men who have been leaders in the Washington party. His vetoes, and the reasons he gives therefor, are along the lines for which the Progressives have been contending, that legislation that is only enacted in order to create new offices and increase salaries is vicious in principle. When a governor sets himself up against such legislation and against any organization that encourages that kind of legislation, he should receive the support of all the good people of the state, regardless of party.

"We Progressives are sure of the fact that our activities in 1912, in carrying the state for Roosevelt and carrying the war against special privilege into the national fight, ed to the organization picking a man like Brumbaugh for its nominee. And now, when Governor Brumbaugh is fulfilling his open pledges, made both before election and at his inaugural, it is due to the people as a whole, who believe in the ideal of a government of and for the people to give him the loyal support he deserves."

WARNED TO PREPARE FOR BIG IMMIGRATION AFTER WAR

San Francisco, June 15.—In view of the increase in immigration which will in all probability succeed the close of the war in Europe, delegates in attendance at the American Society of Tropical Medicine, which is meet-here today, received with great interest the report of Surgeon Allan J. McLaughlin of the United States Public Health Service, now the Commissioner of Health of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, on "The Control of Asiatic Cholera on International Trade Routes."

The report included a consideration of the prevention of the introduction of the disease by sea routes through the establishment of frontier quarantine stations. The essentials of successful quarantine were fully discussed, and a considerable portion of the report was devoted to the technique of bacterialogical examinations for the determination of the cholera vibrio, the causative agent of cholera. Several time-saving measures were suggested, and the tests which could be rapidly applied were considered in detail.

(BY UNITED PRESS)

London, June 15.—"Who died as a result of the violation of all the laws of humanity" was suggested by Sir Edward Carson as a fitting epitaph for the victims of the Lusitania disaster during an investigation of that affair at Westminster today.

Representing the government, Eid Edward told the board of trade, under whose auspices the investigation is being conducting, that the Lusitania was not armed ,and that she did not carry British troops. He said that the vesse was making 1 knots an hour when she was struck by at least two, and posibly three, torpedoes. His arraingment of the German submarine policy was bitter.

"NEW" NOISES MADE BY MODERN BULLETS

Din of Battle a Thing of the Past in Modern Warfare, Says Correspondent

Comparison Discloses Oddities of Sound Made by German, French and British Shells and Small Arms —Night Sounds in Trenches Mournful.

London, May 26:(By Mail to New York)—That old expression, "The Din of Battle" is dead.

"It's batter and crash, a spit and screech, a nd'Hell let Loose' doesn't half describe the noise of combined rifle, machine gun shell fire and bombs in this day and age," said a soldier back from the battlefield or Northern France today.

"If any one could properly describe a modern battle Dante's picture of Inferno would represent peace in contrast," he added, explaining the sounds that the modern soldier's ear has come to recognize.

"German fire sounds different from the British and there are a thousand different individual sounds to break the stillness. Distant individual fire represents the patting of clay with a spade; distant rapid reminds one of the purring of a powerful motor car. The German bullet "cracks" and the British sounds like the bursting of a soft paper bag. Sometimes a German bullet richocheting in the sand "bizzes"; sometimes its lightening flight sounds like a man half whistling, half hissing through his teeth. Glancing off metal it "pings" then "screeches" until it stops. Passing close by a bullet gives a "crack" and it may deafen the nearest ear for days. Like their rifle shots the German machine guns sound less muffled than the British. They sound like the infinitely swift rapping of a door knocker. Ours might be likened to a carpet being beaten by very dexterous and energetic spring cleaners armed with canes.

"The sounds of shell fire are varied. The German's "pipe squeak" and sometimes scream "Little Willie." High explosives shells are fickle; sometimes they burst with a blinding flash and little sound and again they crack like a thunderbolt. Some shells "whistle' ' and some pass through the air like moaning wind. Anti-aircraft guns "ping-ping" and the bursting of their shrapnel most often "catters,"; but if it is lyddite it crashes like a collapsing brick smoke stack.

"Night sounds in the trenches are many and varied. A sentry's strained ears may catch the sound of shoveling with spades and the tap of a mallet on wooden stakes This comes when the enemy's trench is near and denotes that he is driving a sap, digging an advanced trench, or constructing wire entaglnements. Sometimes comes the whir of a dynamo. It is a sure sign that the enemy is working an electrical trench digger. If the trenches are close one may hear the movements of enemy reliefs of reinforcements behind their lines. It is generally possible to hear sounds of guns or transport being moved. On a quiet night this sound is audible for miles. It's the same with the human voice. The sentry is sometimes greeted with good English from German trenches or with a song. The strange sacred cries of flying lapwings, the mewing of homeless cats and the whinning of dogs are but few of the wierd sounds that greet the lonely sentry at night. The novice has often been rudely scared by the snoring song of a soldier-pal at peace with the whole world, the Germans included.' '

BULGARIA MAY ENTER WAR AS ALLY OF THE GERMANS, ROME HEARS

(BY UNITED PRESS)

Rome, June 15.—An unconfirmed report that Bulgaria has placed a huge order for arms and ammunition in the United States and arranged for its financing through German banks caused a mild sensation here today, and renewed speculation on the subject of Bulgaria's entry into the war as one of the Teutonic allies.

The source of the rumor remains a mystery, although it has been traced through creditabe financial houses, and to the Quirinal.. The Bulgarian minister declined to affirm or deny the report.

Germans Revolt Against Idea of a World War

(SPECIAL TO THE PROGRESS)

Berlin, June 15.—That political and business interests oppose fighting everybody and that Germany is revolting against rabid war apostles in Berlin was indicated in a noteworthy article printed in the Lokal Anzeiger, the paper behind which are influential representatives of politics and business, to secure a German American understanding. Herr Zimmerman, general director of the paper, says that on the basis that passengers on ships with special marks of identification and sailing under the government guarantee that they are unarmed a new form might be given to naval warfare and the vessels would receive proper consideration at the hands of submarine commanders.

AT COULD WE DO AT WAR?

ites a correspondent to the Inquirer, "suppose President Wil ail in getting satisfaction from Germany and should declare u, I don't want to see war come, but just suppose that it should ... What could the United States do? As I understand it, our regular army consists of only about 30,000 men."

Let us start from a right basis. President Wilson could not declare war in any circumstances. The most that he could do would be to sever diplomatic relations—order the American ambassador at Berlin to come home and hand to the German ambassador at Washington, Count von Bernstorff, his passports. If war should follow it would be upon the declaration of Germany or by a vote of the senate and house of representative of the United States. Congress is not in session and can meet only after a notice of thirty days.

What could the United States do should hostilities unfortunately come with Germany? We confess that the question is not an easy one to answer. Our correspondent is correct in his belief that we have only about 30,000 regulars—that is to say, mobile forces that could be utilized. The army is larger, but the remainder of it is scattered in the Philippines and in other possessions and in fixed posts like fortifications. We need those 30,000 regulars in this country, for there is the Mexican border to deal with. If sent abroad there would have to be a call on the National guard to supply their places.

We do not imagine, however, that any American soldiers would be ordered to Europe. If congress saw fit it would invite volunteers to form regiments and equip and arm them and send them forth. There may be some men, like Colonel Roosevelt, who would spring to the front with offers to organize troops. If so, before they could be of use they would have to be trained.

We have a few battleships of the older type that might of service against Turkey. But what we would naturally do would be to send destroyers to the English channel and the Irish sea to act as convoys for merchant vessels.

But after all, the best work that we could accomplish would probably be by placing our vast resources at the disposal of England, France and Russia. We should cut off every means of communication with Germany and supply immense quantities of ammunition to the armies fighting Germany in the field.

However, this is all mere speculation. We are not at war yet, and if Germany is disposed to be at all sensible there will be no war. It is almost impossible to believe that hostilities will come.—Philadephia Inquirer.

INPROVING THE LAWN

(SECOND OF SERIES OF ARTICLES ON THE CARE OF LAWNS)

Mowing, Rolling and Sprinkling

There is no hard and fast rule in connection with mowing the lawn, but clipping twice a week is not apt to injure it, and will induce the formation of good turf, according to the lawn specialists of the U. S. Department of agriculture. Too frequent clipping, however, is a drain on the vitality of the grass, and frequently results in permanent injury.

There is some difference of opinion as to whether clippings shoud be removed after mowing, but in general their removal is advised, especially during wet weather, since if left to lie on the surface they are conducive to the growth of molds, which in turn produce injury to the turf. On new seedings, however, or where the grass is thin clippings can frequently be allowed to remain with benefit.

New seeding should not be clipped closely, and during the hot weather of midsummer and eary fall the mower should be set high for old and new alike. The roller should be used discreetly. New grass is frequently benefited by a light rolling after the first cutting. Old sod should be rolled in the spring to firm the surface that has been loosened by freezing and thawing, but during mid-season it is very doubtful if the lawn should be rolled even lightly, especially where the soil is of a heavy nature.

There are probably more mistakes made in connection with the watering of the lawn than in any other phase of its management. The practice of sprinkling as it is almost universally folowed is fundamentaly wrong, not that the sprinkler noes not furnish enough water to the grass during the season, but that it does not furnish it in properly distributed quantities. Sprinkling for a short period may appear to wet the sod thoroughly, but in reality the water does not penetrate much below the surface. This encourages the formation of surface roots and makes the grass less resistant to the severe conditions of weather and usage.

Except in rare cases, the lawn should not be watered oftener than two or three times a week, provided watering is done properly. A thorough soaking is necessary and should be given in the late afternoon or early morning. The ordinary type of revolving spray is quite satisfactory, but the amount of water applied by it is usually much less than appears. The point to be borne in mind is that the ground should be thoroughly saturated at each application to at least three inches in depth.

Consumption on Decrease In The United States

Seattle, June 15.—That this country suffers an economic loss of $214,500,000, every year through the death of tuberculosis victims and persons of consumptive tendencies was the startling statement made by Dr. George M. Kober, of Washington D. C., President of the National Association for the study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, before that body in convention here today. In 1913 143,000 persons died from tuberculosis in the United States, which according to Dr. Kober, signifies the presence of about 1,430,000 consumptives in this country.

"Great and grave as the problem may appear, there is certainly hope when we consider that the death rate from this disease has been reduced from 326 per 1000 population in 1880 to 147.6 in 1913," stated Dr. Kober "This means that if the former rate has been continued the number of deaths from this cause would have been 322,027 instead of 143,000 in 1913, equivalent to a saving of 179,027 during one year."

Dr. Kober made some recommendations for drastic action by the National Association that would lead to further decreased in the death rate from tuberculosis.

Dr. William Charles White, medical director of the Tuberculosis League of Pittsburg, declared the universality of the disease established it as a federal problem, in which the obstacle "states rights" should not be allowed to enter. He advised the adoption by all states of the laws affecting tuberculosis prevention enacted in New York and Massachusetts.

Discussing the medical profession's responsibility in the battle against tuberculosis, Dr. John Ritter, of Chicago, who is the physician in charge of the Rush Medical College's Tuberculosis Dispensary, told the Clinical section of the convention that "by the method of percutaneous, or skin vaccination, a larger cutaneous surface may be exposed for the production of these defensive agencies than may be possible by any other method."

Asserting that the most frequent problem to be solved in treating the consumptive is food and its assimilation, Dr Ethan A. Gray, of Chicago, declared that "even since the campaign against tuberculosis attained full headway, forced feeding of highly nutritious food has been the common practice."

This, Dr. Gray said, was radically wrong, for overfeeding often results in complete loss of appetite and very little gain in weight. The best diet is that which appeals to the patient, even if it is plain corned beef and cabbage, said the physician.

Drs.John B. Manning and Howard James Knott, of Seattle made a report on a clinical study of 223 children they examined during the last two years in relation to tuberculosis exposure. Dr. Charles J. Hartfield, executive secretary of the National Association, discussed the relationship of state and local work in fighting the deadly disease.

Osceola Mills, June 14.—The address of Rev. A. J. Knox of Morrisdale at the Y. M. C. A. meeting for men only was greatly appreciated by the audience. The speaker did not mince words but called a spade a spade. At the close of the address every man present went to the front and took his hand in pledge for a higher stand for morality in the community.

Sunday was a great day in the churches in this town. Although the rain came down in sheets, long before the hour for the opening of the service the large Catholic church was crowded with those who desired to see Rev. The names of two surviving sons Richard and Benjamin who live in California were omitted in the former notice published in these columns. The many beautiful floral emblems were evidence of the esteem in which this estimable woman was held by those who knew her. # "Loggers" Against The "Rafters"

By John B. Rumberger

The sawed boards, the product of the water-power mills, were made into rafts of usually ten platforms, containing altogether about 60,000 feet, board measure. The timber rafts, constructed of full-length logs which had been hewn square by the axmen, were ordinarily 200 feet in length and 22 feet wide. The pieces of timber were held together by hickory saplings bowed across the ends and along the sides of the raft and fastened to the timbers. An oar at each end enabled the raftsmen to float in midstream and steer clear of sandbars and projecting rocks. Unless there was some urgent reason for haste the rafting was done during the daylight hours. At dusk, with the raft safely anchored to a tree handy the water line, the crew spent the nights pleasantly around a campfire. If the destination were one of the points far down the river, a rude shelter, containing a stove and cooking utensils, was erected on the raft before starting. At the end of the voyage the whole outfit was sold to millowners, dealers or builders. The raftsmen, on foot, followed the river back to their camps or homes.

Entirely different were the methods of the log-floaters, and it was apparent that it their way prevailed generally, rafting would prove to be an unprofitable occupation and business, and the lumber industry, which had appeared to be of enduring permanence, would quickly come to an end for both raftsmen and log-floaters.

They came in the wake of a great storm, these men who threatened to upset the order of things as established by the rafting lumbermen. The storm was in 1847, and is said to have been the severest and most destructive that ever visited the West Branch country. For miles the devastation was appalling. Virtually all the trees on a 400-acre tract at "The Shelvings," on Moshannon creek, near where the town of Peale, Clearfield county, is now located, were blown to the ground by the resistless wind. The wrecked tract was for months a point of interest to the curious, who came and viewed with awe the awful havoc wrought by the elements.

The timber on the tract was owned by the Portland Lumber company, of Maine, and to prevent the oss of so much valuable property, the firm finally decided to have the wrecked trees, which were unfit for rafting timber, cut into sawlogs and floated to some point where they could be conveniently converted into planks and boards.

After considerable delay, J. B. Wing and a man named Getchell agreed to get the fallen timber in shape for floating, but, understanding the opposition such a proceeding would create, hesitated over the proposition to place the logs in the water to float promiscuously. In the end, however, a contract to that effect was entered into, and early in 1851 J. B. Wing, with a large force of men, began work on the wrecked timber. A sawmill was built at Lock Haven, and it was panned to catch the logs at the mill by means of a temporary boom—a sort of surface dam, made of logs coupled at their ends with links of heavy chain, reaching across the water and anchored at shore points. In the spring of 1852 more than 2,000,000 feet of logs were tumbled into the creek. They floated out into the river and were driven to their destination with few mishaps. Men in boats followed the logs and kept the mass moving and prevented serious jams.

The proceeding astonished the rafting lumbermen, although they were indignant that the river, a highway to their markets, should be thus utilized, regardless of the damage the floating logs might cause the fleet of rafts. From the beginning of the lumber industry in the West Branch country raftsmen had guarded the river and larger contributing streams and kept them open to navigation.

"Well, that will end it," one of them remarked. "There's nothing more at 'The Shelvings' that's worth putting into the creek. But if we should get another storm like that in '47, and some of these fellows take the notion to dump the wrecks into the river, we'll have to dredge it before it's fit for rafting."

The experiment of Wing and Getchell demonstrated log-floating to be a rapid and comparatively inexpensive method of getting large quantities of timber down the river, and before the work of sawing the logs was completed, the plans to purchase tracts of standing timber and cut and float the logs to Lock Haven and Williamsport, and at those places manufactures them into umber, was under discussion by men who believed they saw opportunities for the making of profitable inevatments. As a further experiment and to test the strength of the opposition they would encounter from the rafting lumbermen, a small timber tract, located at a point on Moshannon creek above "The Shelvings," was purchased. The trees were cut down and the logs successfully floated to Lock Haven. Shortly afterward a permanent boom was constructed at Williamsport and steam-power sawmils erected. Logging jobs were started on other streams, and it was apparent extensive operations were panned.

The rafting lumbermen awakened to the dangers that threatened their industry and become aggressively bitter. Log-floating, it was seen, not ony would close down the many sawmills in the region and thus ruin the board business, but in like manner would at once lessen the demand for squared timber. Briefly, the rafting lumbermen were entering a fight for their industrial life. They desired to continue to supply the markets with lumber manufactured in the region. The log-floaters, sawing timber as raw material, planned to carry on the operation of manufacturing it into lumber at points nearer the markets and where it was possible to install improved machinery and steam power. As the log-floaters were enabled to place many thousands of logs in the river in a single season, many citizens of the timber region not directly interested in lumbering, but who favored at least a semblance of conservation, were alarmed over the devastation that threatened the forests, with the consequent obliteration of an important industry. These citizens joined the rafting lumbermen in protesting against booms and log-floating.

SYNOPSIS.

Sanford Quest, master criminologist of the world, finds that in bringing to justice Macdougal, the murderer of Lord Ashleigh's daughter, he has but just begun a life-and-death struggle with a mysterious master criminal. In a hidden hut in Professor Ashleigh's garden he has seen an ape skeleton and a living creature, half monkey, half man, destroyed by fire. In his rooms have appeared black boxes containing notes, signed by a pair of armless hands. Laura and Lenora, his assistants, suspect Craig, the professor's servant, of a double murder. The black boxes continue to appear in uncanny fashion. Craig is trapped, but escapes to England, where Quest, Lenora and the professor follow him. Lord Ashleigh is murdered by the Hands. Craig captured, escapes to Fort Said. Quest and his party follow, and beyond into the desert. They are captured by Mongars, escape with Craig as their captive and turn him over to Inspector French in San Francisco. He escapes from French in a train wreck and is chased by the party across the Mexican line.

TONGUES OF FLAME.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

From the shadows of the trees on the farther side of the river, Craig with strained eyes watched Quest's struggle. He saw him reach Lenora, watched him struggle to the bank with her, waited until he had lifted her on to his horse. Then he turned slowly around and faced the one country in the world where freedom was still possible for him. He looked into the wall of darkness, penetrated only at one spot by a little blaze of light. Slowly, with his arm through the bridle of his horse, he limped towards it. As he drew nearer and discovered its source, he hesitated. The light came through the uncurtained windows of a saloon, three long, yellow shafts illuminating the stunted shrubs and sandy places. Craig kept in the shadow between them and drew a little nearer. From inside he could hear the thumping of a worn piano, the twanging of a guitar, the rattle of glasses, the uproarious shouting of men, the shrill laughter of women. The tired men and the lame horse stole reluctantly a little nearer. Craig listened once more wearily. It was home he longed for so much—and rest. The very thought of the place sickened him. Even when he reached the door, he hesitated and instead of entering stood back amongst the shadows. If only he could find any other sort of shelter!

Inside, the scene was ordinary enough. There was a long bar, against which were lounging half a dozen typical Mexican cowpunchers. There was a small space cleared for dancing, at the farther end of which two performers were making weird but vehement music. Three girls were dancing with cowboys, not ungracefully considering the state of the floor and the frequent discords in the music. One of them—the prettiest—stopped abruptly and pushed her partner away from her.

"You have drunk too much, Jose!" she exclaimed. "You cannot dance. You tread on my feet and you lean against me. I do not like it. I will dance with you another night when you are sober. Go away, please."

Her cavalier swayed for a moment on his feet. Then he looked down upon her with an evil glitter in his eyes. He was tall and thin, with a black mustache and yellow, unpleasant looking teeth.

"So you will not dance any longer with Jose?" he muttered. "Very well, you shall drink with him, then. We will sit together at one of those little tables. Listen, you shall drink wine."

"I do not want to drink wine with you. All that I wish is to be left alone," the girl insisted, curtly. "Go and play cards, if you want to. There is Pierre over there, and Diego. Perhaps you may win some money. They say that drunkards have all the luck."

Jose leered at her.

"Presently I will play cards," he said. "Presently I will win all their money and I will buy jewelry for you. Marta—stones that look like diamonds and will sparkle in your neck and in your hair."

She turned disdainfully away.

"I do not want your jewelry, Jose," she declared.

He caught her suddenly by the wrist.

"Perhaps this is what you want," he cried, as he stooped down to kiss her.

She swung her right hand round and struck him on the face. He staggered back for a moment. There was a red flush which showed through the tan of his cheek. Then he drew a little nearer to her, and before she could escape had passed his long arm around her body. He drew her to the chair placed by the side of the wall. His left hand played with the knife at his belt.

"Marta, little sweetheart," he said, mockingly, "you must pay for that blow. Don't be afraid," he went on, as he drew the knife across his leather breeches. "A little scratch across your cheek, so! It is but the brand of your master, a love token from Jose. Steady, now, little Maverick!"

The girl struggled violently, but Jose was strong; such brawls were common and those of the company who noticed at all, merely laughed at the girl's futile struggles. Jose's arm was already raised with the knife in his hand, when a sudden blow brought a yell of pain to his lips. The knife fell clattering to the floor. He sprang up, his eyes red with fury. A man had entered the door from behind and was standing within a few feet of him, a man with long, pale face, dark eyes, travel-stained, and with the air of a fugitive. A flood of incoherent abuse streamed from Jose's lips. He stooped for the knife. Marta threw herself upon him. The two cowboys who had been dancing suddenly intervened. The girl screamed.

"It was Jose's fault!" she cried. "Jose was mad. He would have killed me!"

Craig faced them all with sudden courage.

"As I came in," he explained, "that man had his knife raised to stab the girl. You don't allow that sort of thing, do you, here?"

The two cowboys linked their arms through Jose's and led him off toward the door.

The girl clutched at Craig's arm.

"Sit down here, please," she begged. "Wait."

She disappeared for a moment and came back with a glass full of wine, which she set down on the table.

"Drink this," she invited. "And thank you for saving me."

Craig emptied the glass eagerly.

"I just happened to be the first to see him," he said. "They aren't quite wild enough to allow that here, are they?"

"Quien sabe? The girls do not like me! The men do not care," she declared. "Jose took me by surprise, though, or I would have killed him. But who are you, and where did you come from?"

She nodded understandingly.

"Were they after you?"

"Yes! with a warrant for my arrest!"

She patted his hand.

"You are safe now," she whispered. "We care that much for a United States warrant," and she snapped her slim fingers. "You shall stay with us for a time. We will take care of you."

He sighed wearily.

* * * * * * *

Back in the camp, a spirit of devilry had entered into Long Jim and his mates. A tactless remark on the part of one of the deputies had set alight the smoldering fire of resentment which the cowboys had all the time felt against them. At a word from Long Jim they were taken by surprise and tied to the wagon.

The deputies spluttered with rage and fear. Shot rained about them and the canvas of the wagon was riddled.

Suddenly they all paused to listen. The sound of a horse's slow footfall was heard close at hand. Presently Quest appeared out of the shadows, carrying Lenora in his arms. Laura rushed forward.

"Lenora!" she cried. "Is she hurt?"

Quest laid her tenderly upon the ground.

"We had a spill at the bridge," he explained, quickly. "I don't know whether Craig loosened the supports. He got over all right, but it went down under Lenora, who was following, and I had to get her out of the river. Where's the professor?"

The professor came ambling from the tent where he had been lying. He stooped at once over Lenora's still unconscious form.

"Dear me!" he exclaimed. "Dear me! Come, come!"

He passed his hand over her side and made a brief examination.

"Four ribs broken," he pronounced. "It will be a week, at any rate, before we are able to move her. Nothing more serious, so far as I can see, Mr Quest, but she'll need rest and all the comfort we can give her."

"Say, that's too bad!" Long Jim declared. "If you've got to stay around for a time, though, you can have the tents. We boys can double up anywhere, or bunk on the ground. That's right, ain't it?" he added, turning around to the cowboys.

There was a little grunt of acquiescence. They carried Lenora to the largest of the tents and made her as comfortable as possible.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The girl drew a low stool over to Craig's side. He was sitting in a rough chair tilted back against the adobe wall of the saloon.

"As tired as ever?" she asked, laying her hand upon his for a moment.

He turned his head and looked at her.

"Always tired," he answered, listlessly.

She made a little grimace.

"But you are so strange," she protested. "Over the hills there are the steam cars. They would take you to some of our beautiful cities, where all is light and gayety. You are safe here, whatever your troubles may have been. You say that you have money, and if you are lonely," she added, dropping her voice, "you need not go alone."

He patted her hand affectionately, but there was something a little forced about the action.

"Child," he said, "it is so hard to make you understand. I might lose myself for a few minutes, it is true, over yonder. Perhaps, even," he added, "you might help me to forget. And then there would be the awakening. That is always the same. Sometimes at night I sleep, and when I sleep I rest, and when my eyes are opened in the morning the weight comes back and sits upon my heart, and the strength seems to pass from my limbs and the will from my brain."

Her eyes were soft and her voice shook a little as she leaned towards him. Something in his helplessness had kindled the protective spirit in her.

"Has life been so terrible for you?" she whispered. "Have you left behind—but no! you never could have been really wicked. You are not very old, are you? Why do you not stand up and be a man? If you have done wrong, then very likely people have done wrong things to you. Why should you brood over these memories? Why— What are you looking at? Who are those people?"

The professor, with Quest and Long Jim, suddenly appeared round the corner of the building. They walked towards Craig. He shrank back in his place.

"If these are your enemies," the girl cried, fiercely, "remember that they cannot touch you here. I'll have the boys out in a minute, if they dare to try it."

Craig struggled to his feet. He made no answer. His eyes were fixed upon the professor's. The girl passed her arm through his and dragged him into the saloon. They passed Jose in the doorway. He scoffed at them.

"Say, the boss will fire you, Marta, if you waste all your time with that Yankee," he muttered.

Marta drew the red rose from the bosom of her dress and placed it in Craig's buttonhole. Then she led him without a word to a seat.

"If these men try any tricks in here," she said, "there'll be trouble."

Almost at that moment they all three entered. Long Jim nodded to Craig in friendly fashion.

"It's all right, cookie," he told them. "Don't you look so scared. This is just a bit of parleyvous business, that's all."

The professor held out a piece of paper. He handed it over to Craig.

"Craig," he announced, "this is the dispatch which I found in Algiers with my letters. It is addressed to you, but under the circumstances you will scarcely wonder that I opened it. You had better read it."

Craig accepted the cable form and read it through slowly to himself:

To John Craig, Care of Lord Ashleigh, Yonkers, New York:

Your sister died today. Her daughter Mary sails on Tuesday to join you in New York. Please meet her.

COMPTON, Solicitor, London.

Craig sat for a moment as though in a dream.

GERMANY WILLING NOW TO MEDITATE, REPORT IS

Submarine and Blockade Case May be Submitted to Wilson for Settlement

NOTE WILL NOT BE READY FOR FORTNIGHT

Kaiser Returning to Berlin To Begin Work of Framing Reply to President's Note Belief Growing that Strain Will be Relieved

(BY UNITED PRESS)

Berlin, June 15.—It is now certain that Germany's reply to the second American note will not go forward for at least a fortnight, and inquiries at the foreign office indicate that it may be even longer before the note is completed and transmitted.

Emperor William is expected to return to Berlin from his headquarters at the front within a few days. Upon his return work will begin on the first draft of the documens which is so eagery awaited in American.

It is believed here that some expression has been had from London on that part of the note reating to mediation by the United States in the German-British shipping question and the general proposition of the freedomof the seos, and in some quarters the impression is gained that Germany will be entirely willing to submit the matter to mediation.

The German press continues to comment favorably on the pacific tone of the Amreican note, and that Germany's reply will not add further strain to the diplomatic situation is now generally accepted.

BLOCKADE ORDER TO BE CONTINUED, SAYS LONDON

London, June 15.—Little hope is held out here that England will be willing to modify her blockade order even if Germany agrees to discontinue her submarine program. Members of the firm yesterday declined to deny the activities accredited to their concern.

GOVERNOR'S COURSE WINS BACKING OF PROGRESSIVES

Pottsville, Pa., June 15.—That the "back-to-the-party" movement is not without foundation in Schuylkill county is indicated by remarks made this week by William Wilhelm, one of the most active Washington party men in the state. Among other things, Mr. Wilhelm said:

"There is no gainsaying the fact Governor Brumbaugh's vetoes are winning his way into the hearts of the Progressives of the state. That is very generally conceded by all the active men who have been leaders in the Washington party. His vetoes, and the reasons he gives therefor, are along the lines for which the Progressives have been contending, that legislation that is only enacted in order to create new offices and increase salaries is vicious in principle. When a governor sets himself up against such legislation and against any organization that encourages that kind of legislation, he should receive the support of all the good people of the state, regardless of party.

"We Progressives are sure of the fact that our activities in 1912, in carrying the state for Roosevelt and carrying the war against special privilege into the national fight, ed to the organization picking a man like Brumbaugh for its nominee. And now, when Governor Brumbaugh is fulfilling his open pledges, made both before election and at his inaugural, it is due to the people as a whole, who believe in the ideal of a government of and for the people to give him the loyal support he deserves."

WARNED TO PREPARE FOR BIG IMMIGRATION AFTER WAR

San Francisco, June 15.—In view of the increase in immigration which will in all probability succeed the close of the war in Europe, delegates in attendance at the American Society of Tropical Medicine, which is meet here today, received with great interest the report of Surgeon Allan J. McLaughlin of the United States Public Health Service, now the Commissioner of Health of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, on "The Control of Asiatic Cholera on International Trade Routes."

The report included a consideration of the prevention of the introduction of the disease by sea routes through the establishment of frontier quarantine stations. The essentials of successful quarantine were fully discussed, and a considerable portion of the report was devoted to the technique of bacterialogical examinations for the determination of the cholera vibrio, the causative agent of cholera. Several time-saving measures were suggested, and the tests which could be rapidly applied were considered in detail.

"NEW" NOISES MADE BY MODERN BULLETS

Din of Battle a Thing of the Past in Modern Warfare, Says Correspondent

Comparison Discloses Oddities of Sound Made by German, French and British Shells and Small Arms —Night Sounds in Trenches Mournful.

London, May 26:(By Mail to New York)—That old expression, "The Din of Battle" is dead.

"It's batter and crash, a spit and screech, a nd'Hell let Loose' doesn't half describe the noise of combined rifle, machine gun shell fire and bombs in this day and age," said a soldier back from the battlefield or Northern France today.

"If any one could properly describe a modern battle Dante's picture of Inferno would represent peace in contrast," he added, explaining the sounds that the modern soldier's ear has come to recognize.

"German fire sounds different from the British and there are a thousand different individual sounds to break the stillness. Distant individual fire represents the patting of clay with a spade; distant rapid reminds one of the purring of a powerful motor car. The German bullet "cracks" and the British sounds like the bursting of a soft paper bag. Sometimes a German bullet richocheting in the sand "bizzes"; sometimes its lightening flight sounds like a man half whistling, half hissing through his teeth. Glancing off metal it "pings" then "screeches" until it stops. Passing close by a bullet gives a "crack" and it may deafen the nearest ear for days. Like their rifle shots the German machine guns sound less muffled than the British. They sound like the infinitely swift rapping of a door knocker. Ours might be likened to a carpet being beaten by very dexterous and energetic spring cleaners armed with canes.

"The sounds of shell fire are varied. The German's "pipe squeak" and sometimes scream "Little Willie." High explosives shells are fickle; sometimes they burst with a blinding flash and little sound and again they crack like a thunderbolt. Some shells "whistle' ' and some pass through the air like moaning wind. Anti-aircraft guns "ping-ping" and the bursting of their shrapnel most often "catters,"; but if it is lyddite it crashes like a collapsing brick smoke stack.

"Night sounds in the trenches are many and varied. A sentry's strained ears may catch the sound of shoveling with spades and the tap of a mallet on wooden stakes This comes when the enemy's trench is near and denotes that he is driving a sap, digging an advanced trench, or constructing wire entaglnements. Sometimes comes the whir of a dynamo. It is a sure sign that the enemy is working an electrical trench digger. If the trenches are close one may hear the movements of enemy reliefs of reinforcements behind their lines. It is generally possible to hear sounds of guns or transport being moved. On a quiet night this sound is audible for miles. It's the same with the human voice. The sentry is sometimes greeted with good English from German trenches or with a song. The strange sacred cries of flying lapwings, the mewing of homeless cats and the whinning of dogs are but few of the wierd sounds that greet the lonely sentry at night. The novice has often been rudely scared by the snoring song of a soldier-pal at peace with the whole world, the Germans included.' '

Germans Revolt Against Idea of a World War

(SPECIAL TO THE PROGRESS)

Berlin, June 15.—That political and business interests oppose fighting everybody and that Germany is revolting against rabid war apostles in Berlin was indicated in a noteworthy article printed in the Lokal Anzeiger, the paper behind which are influential representatives of politics and business, to secure a German American understanding. ## [WH]AT COULD WE DO AT WAR?

[...]rites a correspondent to the Inquirer, "suppose President Wil[son f]ail in getting satisfaction from Germany and should declar[e ...]u, I don't want to see war come, but just suppose that it should. [...] What could the United States do? As I understand it, our regular army consists of only about 30,000 men."

Let us start from a right basis. President Wilson could not declare war in any circumstances. The most that he could do would be to sever diplomatic relations—order the American ambassador at Berlin to come home and hand to the German ambassador at Washington, Count von Bernstorff, his passports. If war should follow it would be upon the declaration of Germany or by a vote of the senate and house of representative of the United States. Congress is not in session and can meet only after a notice of thirty days.

What could the United States do should hostilities unfortunately come with Germany? We confess that the question is not an easy one to answer. Our correspondent is correct in his belief that we have only about 30,000 regulars—that is to say, mobile forces that could be utilized. The army is larger, but the remainder of it is scattered in the Philippines and in other possessions and in fixed posts like fortifications. We need those 30,000 regulars in this country, for there is the Mexican border to deal with. If sent abroad there would have to be a call on the National guard to supply their places.

We do not imagine, however, that any American soldiers would be ordered to Europe. If congress saw fit it would invite volunteers to form regiments and equip and arm them and send them forth. There may be some men, like Colonel Roosevelt, who would spring to the front with offers to organize troops. If so, before they could be of use they would have to be trained.

We have a few battleships of the older type that might of service against Turkey. But what we would naturally do would be to send destroyers to the English channel and the Irish sea to act as convoys for merchant vessels.

But after all, the best work that we could accomplish would probably be by placing our vast resources at the disposal of England, France and Russia. We should cut off every means of communication with Germany and supply immense quantities of ammunition to the armies fighting Germany in the field.

However, this is all mere speculation. We are not at war yet, and if Germany is disposed to be at all sensible there will be no war. It is almost impossible to believe that hostilities will come.—Philadephia Inquirer.

INPROVING THE LAWN

Mowing, Rolling and Sprinkling

There is no hard and fast rule in connection with mowing the lawn, but clipping twice a week is not apt to injure it, and will induce the formation of good turf, according to the lawn specialists of the U. S. Department of agriculture. Too frequent clipping, however, is a drain on the vitality of the grass, and frequently results in permanent injury.

There is some difference of opinion as to whether clippings shoud be removed after mowing, but in general their removal is advised, especially during wet weather, since if left to lie on the surface they are conducive to the growth of molds, which in turn produce injury to the turf. On new seedings, however, or where the grass is thin clippings can frequently be allowed to remain with benefit.

New seeding should not be clipped closely, and during the hot weather of midsummer and eary fall the mower should be set high for old and new alike. The roller should be used discreetly. New grass is frequently benefited by a light rolling after the first cutting. Old sod should be rolled in the spring to firm the surface that has been loosened by freezing and thawing, but during midseason it is very doubtful if the lawn should be rolled even lightly, especially where the soil is of a heavy nature.

There are probably more mistakes made in connection with the watering of the lawn than in any other phase of its management. The practice of sprinkling as it is almost universally folowed is fundamentaly wrong, not that the sprinkler noes not furnish enough water to the grass during the season, but that it does not furnish it in properly distributed quantities. Sprinkling for a short period may appear to wet the sod thoroughly, but in reality the water does not penetrate much below the surface. This encourages the formation of surface roots and makes the grass less resistant to the severe conditions of weather and usage.

Except in rare cases, the lawn should not be watered oftener than two or three times a week, provided watering is done properly. A thorough soaking is necessary and should be given in the late afternoon or early morning. The ordinary type of revolving spray is quite satisfactory, but the amount of water applied by it is usually much less than appears. The point to be borne in mind is that the ground should be thoroughly saturated at each application to at least three inches in depth.

Consumption on Decrease In The United States

Seattle, June 15.—That this country suffers an economic loss of $214,500,000, every year through the death of tuberculosis victims and persons of consumptive tendencies was the startling statement made by Dr. George M. Kober, of Washington D. C., President of the National Association for the study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, before that body in convention here today. In 1913 143,000 persons died from tuberculosis in the United States, which according to Dr. Kober, signifies the presence of about 1,430,000 consumptives in this country.

"Great and grave as the problem may appear, there is certainly hope when we consider that the death rate from this disease has been reduced from 326 per 1000 population in 1880 to 147.6 in 1913," stated Dr. Kober "This means that if the former rate has been continued the number of deaths from this cause would have been 322,027 instead of 143,000 in 1913, equivalent to a saving of 179,027 during one year."

Dr. Kober made some recommendations for drastic action by the National Association that would lead to further decreased in the death rate from tuberculosis.

Dr. William Charles White, medical director of the Tuberculosis League of Pittsburg, declared the universality of the disease established it as a federal problem, in which the obstacle "states rights" should not be allowed to enter. He advised the adoption by all states of the laws affecting tuberculosis prevention enacted in New York and Massachusetts.

Discussing the medical profession's responsibility in the battle against tuberculosis, Dr. John Ritter, of Chicago, who is the physician in charge of the Rush Medical College's Tuberculosis Dispensary, told the Clinical section of the convention that "by the method of percutaneous, or skin vaccination, a larger cutaneous surface may be exposed for the production of these def[ensive] agencies than may be possible by any other method."

Asserting that the most frequent problem to be solved in treating the consumptive is food and its assimilation, Dr Ethan A. Gray, of Chicago, declared that "even since the campaign against tuberculosis attained full headway, forced feeding of highly nutritious food has been the common practice."

This, Dr. Gray said, was radically wrong, for overfeeding often results in complete loss of appetite and very little gain in weight. The best diet is that which appeals to the patient, even if it is plain corned beef and cabbage, said the physician.

Drs.John B. Manning and Howard James Knott, of Seattle made a report on a clinical study of 223 children they examined during the last two years in relation to tuberculosis exposure. Dr. Charles J. Hartfield, executive secretary of the National Association, discussed the relationship of state and local work in fighting the deadly disease.

OSCEOLA MILLS

Osceola Mills, June 14.—The address of Rev. A. J. Knox of Morrisdale at the Y. M. C. A. meeting for men only was greatly appreciated by the audience. The speaker did not mince words but called a spade a spade. At the close of the address every man present went to the front and took his hand in pledge for a higher stand for morality in the community.

Sunday was a great day in the churches in this town. Although the rain came down in sheets, long before the hour for the opening of the service the large Catholic church was crowded with those who desired to see Rev. Gerald Dugan of this place, ordained to the priesthood. Many visiting priests and friends of the young man were present. A sumptous dinner was prepared at their hotel, the Mountain House by the parents of the newly elevated priest. After the evening service music and speeches on the spacious lawn of the parsonage concluded the exercises of the day.

At the Methodist church the evening service was in charge of the Sabbath school in observance of Childrens Day. Many were unabe to gain admittance. A splendid program was presented. The baptism of children was a part of the service. A handsome sum was raised for the educational board of the church.

At the Presbyterian church the entire day was given to children. An interesting program of music and recitations was rendered at both the morning and evening service. A number of children were baptised at both services. The offering will be sent to the board of Sabbath school work.

Miss Carrie Brown left on Saturday for Williamsport where she will attend the commencement exercises of Dickinson Seminary this week.

S. W. McLarren and daughter Hester left here Monday morning in their auto for Painsvie, Ohio, to attend the commencement exercises, Miss Rachel being one of the graduates.

The ninth annual convention of the tenth district of Clearfield county Sabbath School association will be held at the Congregational church at Cuba mines Friday, June 18, commencing at 10:15 a. m. The district comprises Osceola and Wallaceton boroughs, and Decatur and Boggs townships. There are twenty-one Sabbath schools in the district.

The funeral of Mrs. Louis Kline was held from her late residence on Saturday, her pastor Rev. S. T. Lewis conducting the service, assisted by Rev. H. H. Crotsley. The names of two surviving sons Richard and Benjamin who live in California were omitted in the former notice published in these columns. The many beautiful floral emblems were evidence of the esteem in which this estimable woman was held by those who knew her. Interment was made in Umbria cemetery, Haworth brothers, undertakers of Philipsburg, were in charge of the funeral which was largely attended.

Mr. Merrett president of the Philipsburg coal and land company transacted business in town this week.

Mrs. William McFetters is visiting friends in Philadephia.

Mrs. W. A. Brown returned on Friday from a four weeks visit in Lock Haven and Jersey Shore. Mrs. Sarah Waters of the latter place accompanied her home and will visit here for a few weeks.

"Loggers" Against The "Rafters"

The sawed boards, the product of the water-power mills, were made into rafts of usually ten platforms, containing altogether about 60,000 feet, board measure. The timber rafts, constructed of full-length logs which had been hewn square by the axmen, were ordinarily 200 feet in length and 22 feet wide. The pieces of timber were held together by hickory saplings bowed across the ends and along the sides of the raft and fastened to the timbers. An oar at each end enabled the raftsmen to float in midstream and steer clear of sandbars and projecting rocks. Unless there was some urgent reason for haste the rafting was done during the daylight hours. At dusk, with the raft safely anchored to a tree handy the water line, the crew spent the nights pleasantly around a campfire. If the destination were one of the points far down the river, a rude shelter, containing a stove and cooking utensils, was erected on the raft before starting. At the end of the voyage the whole outfit was sold to millowners, dealers or builders. The raftsmen, on foot, followed the river back to their camps or homes.

Entirely different were the methods of the log-floaters, and it was apparent that it their way prevailed generally, rafting would prove to be an unpofitable occupation and business, and the lumber industry, which had appeared to be of enduring permanence, would quickly come to an end for both raftsmen and log-floaters.

They came in the wake of a great storm, these men who threatened to upset the order of things as established by the rafting lumbermen. The storm was in 1847, and is said to have been the severest and most destructive that ever visited the West Branch country. For miles the devastation was appalling. Virtually all the trees on a 400-acre tract at "The Shelvings," on Moshannon creek, near where the town of Peale, Clearfield county, is now located, were blown to the ground by the resistless wind. The wrecked tract was for months a point of interest to the curious, who came and viewed with awe the awful havoc wrought by the elements.

The timber on the tract was owned by the Portland Lumber company, of Maine, and to prevent the oss of so much valuable property, the firm finally decided to have the wrecked trees, which were unfit for rafting timber, cut into sawlogs and floated to some point where they could be conveniently converted into planks and boards.

After considerable delay, J. B. Wing and a man named Getchell agreed to get the fallen timber in shape for floating, but, understanding the opposition such a proceeding would create, hesitated over the proposition to place the logs in the water to float promiscuously. In the end, however, a contract to that effect was entered into, and early in 1851 J. B. Wing, with a large force of men, began work on the wrecked timber. A sawmill was built at Lock Haven, and it was panned to catch the logs at the mill by means of a temporary boom—a sort of surface dam, made of logs coupled at their ends with links of heavy chain, reaching across the water and anchored at shore points. In the spring of 1852 more than 2,000,000 feet of logs were tumbled into the creek. They floated out into the river and were driven to their destination with few mishaps. Men in boats followed the logs and kept the mass moving and prevented serious jams.

The proceeding astonished the rafting lumbermen, although they were indignant that the river, a highway to their markets, should be thus utilized, regardless of the damage the floating logs might cause the fleet of rafts. From the beginning of the lumber industry in the West Branch country raftsmen had guarded the river and larger contributing streams and kept them open to navigation.

"Well, that will end it," one of them remarked. "There's nothing more at 'The Shelvings' that's worth putting into the creek. But if we should get another storm like that in '47, and some of these fellows take the notion to dump the wrecks into the river, we'll have to dredge it before it's fit for rafting."

The experiment of Wing and Getchell demonstrated log-floating to be a rapid and comparatively inexpensive method of getting large quantities of timber down the river, and before the work of sawing the logs was completed, the plans to purchase tracts of standing timber and cut and float the logs to Lock Haven and Williamsport, and at those places manufactures them into umber, was under discussion by men who believed they saw opportunities for the making of profitable inevatments. As a further experiment and to test the strength of the opposition they would encounter from the rafting lumbermen, a small timber tract, located at a point on Moshannon creek above "The Shelvings," was purchased. The trees were cut down and the logs successfully floated to Lock Haven. Shortly afterward a permanent boom was constructed at Williamsport and steam-power sawmils erected. Logging jobs were started on other streams, and it was apparent extensive operations were panned.

The rafting lumbermen awakened to the dangers that threatened their industry and become aggressively bitter. Log-floating, it was seen, not ony would close down the many sawmills in the region and thus ruin the board business, but in like manner would at once lessen the demand for squared timber. Briefly, the rafting lumbermen were entering a fight for their industrial life. They desired to continue to supply the markets with lumber manufactured in the region. The log-floaters, sawing timber as raw material, planned to carry on the operation of manufacturing it into lumber at points nearer the markets and where it was possible to install improved machinery and steam power. As the log-floaters were enabled to place many thousands of logs in the river in a single season, many citizens of the timber region not directly interested in lumbering, but who favored at least a semblance of conservation, were alarmed over the devastation that threatened the forests, with the consequent obliteration of an important industry. These citizens joined the rafting lumbermen in protesting against booms and log-floating.

SYNOPSIS.

Sanford Quest, master criminologist of the world, finds that in bringing to justice Macdougal, the murderer of Lord Ashleigh's daughter, he has but just begun a life-and-death struggle with a mysterious master criminal. In a hidden hut in Professor Ashleigh's garden he has seen an ape skeleton and a living creature, half monkey, half man, destroyed by fire. In his rooms have appeared black boxes containing notes, signed by a pair of armless hands. Laura and Lenora, his assistants, suspect Craig, the professor's servant, of a double murder. The black boxes continue to appear in uncanny fashion. Craig is trapped, but escapes to England, where Quest, Lenora and the professor follow him. Lord Ashleigh is murdered by the Hands. Craig captured, escapes to Fort Said. Quest and his party follow, and beyond into the desert. They are captured by Mongars, escape with Craig as their captive and turn him over to Inspector French in San Francisco. He escapes from French in a train wreck and is chased by the party across the Mexican line.

TONGUES OF FLAME.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

From the shadows of the trees on the farther side of the river, Craig with strained eyes watched Quest's struggle. He saw him reach Lenora, watched him struggle to the bank with her, waited until he had lifted her on to his horse. Then he turned slowly around and faced the one country in the world where freedom was still possible for him. He looked into the wall of darkness, penetrated only at one spot by a little blaze of light. Slowly, with his arm through the bridle of his horse, he limped towards it. As he drew nearer and discovered its source, he hesitated. The light came through the uncurtained windows of a saloon, three long, yellow shafts illuminating the stunted shrubs and sandy places. Craig kept in the shadow between them and drew a little nearer. From inside he could hear the thumping of a worn piano, the twanging of a guitar, the rattle of glasses, the uproarious shouting of men, the shrill laughter of women. The tired men and the lame horse stole reluctantly a little nearer. Craig listened once more wearily. It was home he longed for so much—and rest. The very thought of the place sickened him. Even when he reached the door, he hesitated and instead of entering stood back amongst the shadows. If only he could find any other sort of shelter!

Inside, the scene was ordinary enough. There was a long bar, against which were lounging half a dozen typical Mexican cowpunchers. There was a small space cleared for dancing, at the farther end of which two performers were making weird but vehement music. Three girls were dancing with cowboys, not ungracefully considering the state of the floor and the frequent discords in the music. One of them—the prettiest—stopped abruptly and pushed her partner away from her.

"You have drunk too much, Jose!" she exclaimed. "You cannot dance. You tread on my feet and you lean against me. I do not like it. I will dance with you another night when you are sober. Go away, please."

Her cavalier swayed for a moment on his feet. Then he looked down upon her with an evil glitter in his eyes. He was tall and thin, with a black mustache and yellow, unpleasant looking teeth.

"So you will not dance any longer with Jose?" he muttered. "Very well, you shall drink with him, then. We will sit together at one of those little tables. Listen, you shall drink wine."

"I do not want to drink wine with you. All that I wish is to be left alone," the girl insisted, curtly. "Go and play cards, if you want to. There is Pierre over there, and Diego. Perhaps you may win some money. They say that drunkards have all the luck."

Jose leered at her.

"Presently I will play cards," he said. "Presently I will win all their money and I will buy jewelry for you. Marta—stones that look like diamonds and will sparkle in your neck and in your hair."

She turned disdainfully away.

"I do not want your jewelry, Jose," she declared.

He caught her suddenly by the wrist.

"Perhaps this is what you want," he cried, as he stooped down to kiss her.

She swung her right hand round and struck him on the face. He staggered back for a moment. There was a red flush which showed through the tan of his cheek. Then he drew a little nearer to her, and before she could escape had passed his long arm around her body. He drew her to the chair placed by the side of the wall. His left hand played with the knife at his belt.

"Marta, little sweetheart," he said, mockingly, "you must pay for that blow. Don't be afraid," he went on, as he drew the knife across his leather breeches. "A little scratch across your cheek, so! It is but the brand of your master, a love token from Jose. Steady, now, little Maverick!"

The girl struggled violently, but Jose was strong; such brawls were common and those of the company who noticed at all, merely laughed at the girl's futile struggles. Jose's arm was already raised with the knife in his hand, when a sudden blow brought a yell of pain to his lips. The knife fell clattering to the floor. He sprang up, his eyes red with fury. A man had entered the door from behind and was standing within a few feet of him, a man with long, pale face, dark eyes, travel-stained, and with the air of a fugitive. A flood of incoherent abuse streamed from Jose's lips. He stooped for the knife. Marta threw herself upon him. The two cowboys who had been dancing suddenly intervened. The girl screamed.

"It was Jose's fault!" she cried. "Jose was mad. He would have killed me!"

Craig faced them all with sudden courage.

"As I came in," he explained, "that man had his knife raised to stab the girl. You don't allow that sort of thing, do you, here?"

The two cowboys linked their arms through Jose's and led him off toward the door.

The girl clutched at Craig's arm.

"Sit down here, please," she begged. "Wait."

She disappeared for a moment and came back with a glass full of wine, which she set down on the table.

"Drink this," she invited. "And thank you for saving me."

Craig emptied the glass eagerly.

"I just happened to be the first to see him," he said. "They aren't quite wild enough to allow that here, are they?"

"Quien sabe? The girls do not like me! The men do not care," she declared. "Jose took me by surprise, though, or I would have killed him. But who are you, and where did you come from?"

She nodded understandingly.

"Were they after you?"

"Yes! with a warrant for my arrest!"

She patted his hand.

"You are safe now," she whispered. "We care that much for a United States warrant," and she snapped her slim fingers. "You shall stay with us for a time. We will take care of you."

He sighed wearily.

* * * * * * *

Back in the camp, a spirit of devilry had entered into Long Jim and his mates. A tactless remark on the part of one of the deputies had set alight the smoldering fire of resentment which the cowboys had all the time felt against them. At a word from Long Jim they were taken by surprise and tied to the wagon.

The deputies spluttered with rage and fear. Shot rained about them and the canvas of the wagon was riddled.

Suddenly they all paused to listen. The sound of a horse's slow footfall was heard close at hand. Presently Quest appeared out of the shadows, carrying Lenora in his arms. Laura rushed forward.

"Lenora!" she cried. "Is she hurt?"

Quest laid her tenderly upon the ground.

"We had a spill at the bridge," he explained, quickly. "I don't know whether Craig loosened the supports. He got over all right, but it went down under Lenora, who was following, and I had to get her out of the river. Where's the professor?"

The professor came ambling from the tent where he had been lying. He stooped at once over Lenora's still unconscious form.

"Dear me!" he exclaimed. "Dear me! Come, come!"

He passed his hand over her side and made a brief examination.

"Four ribs broken," he pronounced. "It will be a week, at any rate, before we are able to move her. Nothing more serious, so far as I can see, Mr Quest, but she'll need rest and all the comfort we can give her."

"Say, that's too bad!" Long Jim declared. "If you've got to stay around for a time, though, you can have the tents. We boys can double up anywhere, or bunk on the ground. That's right, ain't it?" he added, turning around to the cowboys.

There was a little grunt of acquiescence. They carried Lenora to the largest of the tents and made her as comfortable as possible.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The girl drew a low stool over to Craig's side. He was sitting in a rough chair tilted back against the adobe wall of the saloon.

"As tired as ever?" she asked, laying her hand upon his for a moment.

He turned his head and looked at her.

"Always tired," he answered, listlessly.

She made a little grimace.

"But you are so strange," she protested. "Over the hills there are the steam cars. They would take you to some of our beautiful cities, where all is light and gayety. You are safe here, whatever your troubles may have been. You say that you have money, and if you are lonely," she added, dropping her voice, "you need not go alone."

He patted her hand affectionately, but there was something a little forced about the action.

"Child," he said, "it is so hard to make you understand. I might lose myself for a few minutes, it is true, over yonder. Perhaps, even," he added, "you might help me to forget. And then there would be the awakening. That is always the same. Sometimes at night I sleep, and when I sleep I rest, and when my eyes are opened in the morning the weight comes back and sits upon my heart, and the strength seems to pass from my limbs and the will from my brain."

Her eyes were soft and her voice shook a little as she leaned towards him. Something in his helplessness had kindled the protective spirit in her.

"Has life been so terrible for you?" she whispered. "Have you left behind—but no! you never could have been really wicked. You are not very old, are you? Why do you not stand up and be a man? If you have done wrong, then very likely people have done wrong things to you. Why should you brood over these memories? Why— What are you looking at? Who are those people?"

The professor, with Quest and Long Jim, suddenly appeared round the corner of the building. They walked towards Craig. He shrank back in his place.

"If these are your enemies," the girl cried, fiercely, "remember that they cannot touch you here. I'll have the boys out in a minute, if they dare to try it."

Craig struggled to his feet. He made no answer. His eyes were fixed upon the professor's. The girl passed her arm through his and dragged him into the saloon. They passed Jose in the doorway. He scoffed at them.

"Say, the boss will fire you, Marta, if you waste all your time with that Yankee," he muttered.

Marta drew the red rose from the bosom of her dress and placed it in Craig's buttonhole. Then she led him without a word to a seat.

"If these men try any tricks in here," she said, "there'll be trouble."

Almost at that moment they all three entered. Long Jim nodded to Craig in friendly fashion.

"It's all right, cookie," he told them. "Don't you look so scared. This is just a bit of parleyvous business, that's all."

The professor held out a piece of paper. He handed it over to Craig.

"Craig," he announced, "this is the dispatch which I found in Algiers with my letters. It is addressed to you, but under the circumstances you will scarcely wonder that I opened it. You had better read it."

Craig accepted the cable form and read it through slowly to himself:

To John Craig, Care of Lord Ashleigh, Yonkers, New York:

Your sister died today. Her daughter Mary sails on Tuesday to join you in New York. Please meet her.

COMPTON, Solicitor, London.

Craig sat for a moment as though in a dream.

(To be Continued Tomorrow)
